Churnalism

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

Churnalism is a form of journalism in which press releases, wire stories and other forms of pre-packaged material^[clarification needed] are used to create articles in newspapers and other news media in order to meet increasing pressures of time and cost without undertaking further research or checking.^[1] The neologism "churnalism" has been credited to BBC journalist Waseem Zakir who coined the term in 2008.

Churnalism has increased to the point that many stories found in the press are not original. The decline of original journalism has been associated with a corresponding rise in public relations.^[2]

Prevalence [edit]

In his book Flat Earth News,^[3] the British journalist Nick Davies reported a study at Cardiff University by Professor Justin Lewis and a team of researchers^[4] which found that 80% of the stories in Britain's quality press were not original and that only 12% of stories were generated by reporters.^[1] The result is a reduction of quality and accuracy, as the articles are open to manipulation and distortion.
